Though empty of people, his photos of intimate landscapes are filled with the evidence of humanity. Serene and mysterious, they pause at the interim of past and present, night and day, realism and abstraction, in scenes that invite reverie and reflection. . . . With clarity and simplicity, Kenna's images suggest rather than describe, offering up just a few elements of the landscape, leaving it to the viewer to complete the picture. "In this way, my photos are more like haiku than prose."—from 'Michael Kenna,' Interview by Claire Sykes, April 2003
